COMMENTARY

June was a month in which markets were forced to revisit several assumptions at once: that the US-Iran ceasefire would hold, that energy inflation would fade cleanly, and that AI infrastructure spending could continue to validate itself indefinitely.

For an equity fund built around long-duration themes, perhaps the most important event was Broadcom's post-results sell-off. Record revenues were not enough as investors focused instead on AI guidance that came in fractionally below expectations that prompted a sharp repricing across parts of the AI complex. Markets are beginning to ask harder questions about how infrastructure spending converts into durable end-demand, a meaningful theme within the Polar Capital Artificial Intelligence Fund, representing around 7.4% of the Fund's assets, as it turns its focus to the beneficiaries of AI technologies.

Elsewhere, performance was supported by areas where valuations remain more grounded. Polar Capital Healthcare Opportunities returned 7.0%, Polar Capital Global Insurance returned 10.9%, Regnan Sustainable Water and Waste returned 3.7%, and JK Japan rose 2.4%.

Copper, the Fund's only material non-equity exposure, fell 1.4% in June. Even so, the underlying case remains tied to electrification, grid investment and industrial scarcity rather than to a single month's price move. The portfolio remains positioned around themes with genuine cash-flow potential, but June was a reminder that markets will increasingly distinguish between stories already earning their valuations and those still asking to be believed.
