COMMENTARY

August was characterised by a recovery in risk appetite alongside continuing concerns about geopolitical tensions, public finances and long-dated government-bond yields. Markets found encouragement in strong corporate results from Nvidia and in a softer-than-expected US inflation reading, but these positive developments did not resolve the larger questions surrounding AI investment, government borrowing and the outlook for interest rates.

Gold was the Fund's most significant positive contributor. The iShares Physical Gold ETC rose 12.0% in sterling terms during the month, following a difficult period earlier in the year. With an allocation of around 5%, the position made a meaningful contribution to returns. Gold continues to serve an important diversifying role in the portfolio, particularly when investors are balancing concerns over fiscal sustainability. Continued central-bank purchases have also provided longer-term support for the asset class.

Within fixed income, our focus on shorter and medium maturities remained appropriate. Long-dated US Treasury yields rose sharply during August, with 30-year yields briefly exceeding 5.3%, as investors demanded greater compensation for holding government debt amid rising debt-servicing costs. By contrast, the iShares $ Treasury Bond 7-10yr UCITS ETF, sterling hedged, returned 0.6%, while the Fund's short-dated UK gilt exposure added 0.3%. Although yields are becoming more attractive, the risks associated with duration remain material, particularly at the long end of the curve.

Equity-market returns were generally positive for the month. Semiconductor and Asian technology-related holdings were supported by renewed confidence in the AI infrastructure cycle.

The Fund remains positioned to participate in growth assets while retaining diversifiers and a measured approach to interest-rate risk. In a market shaped by unresolved macroeconomic and geopolitical issues, we believe diversification across equities, alternatives, gold and shorter-duration bonds remains especially valuable.
