COMMENTARY

May saw financial asset prices reflect concerns over how high developed economy central banks would hike official short-term interest rates to belatedly address inflation and regain some credibility in the eyes of investors. First signs of inflation peaking in the US, and an indication of the US Federal Reserve becoming more pragmatic to avoid a recession later in May, brought about some respite for risk asset prices after a torrid time in the first three weeks of May.

The jury is out on recession possibilities and US rate hikes, but breakeven rates have fallen back as have interest rate futures. Signs of moderating inflation have yet to be seen in Europe and the UK. Higher short-term interest rates are coming at a time when households are being hit by higher food and energy prices. Avoiding a recession in the UK and Europe will be more of a challenge than in the US. China's zero-tolerance policy to Covid outbreaks should moderate in the months ahead, easing supply chain problems.

Global equities rebounded strongly in the final week of May almost erasing the losses built up during its first three weeks. Japan was one of the better performers. Thematically, energy transition was a good positive space to be along with materials.

For most of May, the US dollar was firm, only moderating after the realisation that the US Federal Reserve's Open Market Committee's minutes revealed a more pragmatic approach to monetary policy than the previous tough talk had indicated. Sterling weakness was more a reflection of a stronger US currency.

Industrial metals oscillated in May with almost the same volatility as other risk assets while gold fell and oil rose, helped at the end of the month by greater European sanctions on Russian imports. Soft commodities were also volatile but ended up little changed on the month.

With financial market uncertainties persisting, a defensive stance has been maintained.
